"What is offered here is a model that attempts to unify the reasons and explanation for all of human emotion, behaviour and interactions. It is called the Unified Model Of Emotion (UMOE). As pompous as this sounds the model is based on some very simple premises and can be described relatively simply within a series of pictures. Crucially, though, it can be used as a template to explain virtually every human condition. It is understood that UMOE is only a model. It is not a detailed account of the incredible complexity of what is actually occurring, down to an atomic level, in our brains. It is also understood that UMOE could be enhanced with more detailed layers. In fact, at some time it could be entirely replaced by a better system to aid the understanding of human nature whenever a viable alternative is made available. So far, though, nothing else seems to come close.

This is not a self help book. It does not provide a solution to people. It also neither excuses people for their actions or blames them for being genetically "wrong" or different from functional people. It does, though, appropriate responsibility and is uncompromising. The pictures that follow are highly challenging. The more intelligent and/or traumatised the reader the more preposterous they will appear. The reactions to the proposed model may be any combination of: lack of comprehension, dismissal, ridicule, denial, disinterest, irritation, intake of something unhealthy or instant argument."
