Literacy-Book Lover Superbook 8 Books on Reading, Writing & Speaking Tony Kelbrat

These are eight books on reading, writing, speaking, words, grammar, spelling, vocabulary, books, literature and the human database of stories. I created them for either a child or adult learning to read, write and speak English and for adults who want to learn how to write professionally and in the academic world plus I offer ideas on what is considered one of the most feared, dreaded acts of the human condition; speaking to a group of people. I know the secret to it. You simply need to have a good knowledge of the material and have an emotional connection to it so that you can do it from the heart. Beyond this, I created a database for book lovers so you can see the literature out there, much of it free online that has been created throughout human history.

We're nothing without books. Before man could record his thoughts to pass onto the next generation, people had to try to remember things or learn for themselves through trial and error.

Knowledge runs the world. It doesn't matter if books are hard copy or digital. They're still where it's at. I write books because I believe that knowledge is the key to the evolution of humanity.

I read books to learn something. I won't bother with a fictional book if it's considered a minor book created to give somebody a thrill or a minor pleasure which is where most fiction is at. Very few people can write great books that mean something like Grapes of Wrath by John Steineck about poverty, misery, evil people and the will to carry on or Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man by James Joyce about a young man questioning the idols and truths of his Irish cultural upbringing to free himself and live only by what he felt in his soul. Even though Charles Dickens tried to be noble by pointing out the extreme poverty and inequity in Industrial Revolution England, I hate stories with extreme improbable coincidences which is why I don't bother much with fiction anymore. Take Oliver Twist for example. The rich old guy Brownlow stumbles upon an abused orphan kid who he thinks is the son of his long-lost daughter. Why couldn't Dickens have just left it at a kindly old man helping someone out out of the goodness of his heart?

Most fiction is so unbelievable. It requires what movie industry people call suspension of belief. I love it when somebody is being real but where?
