The world ended and everybody panicked. The dead rose and most people died. It is thirty years after the onset of the zombie apocalypse and the novelty has seriously worn off, a feeling Marc and his friends know all too well. Eking out an existence in a small city in Oregon, Marc, his wife Amy and their friends Cleo and Declan have managed to regain some sort of normality, despite being armed ninety percent of the time. While the walking dead are present, boredom and hunger have proven to be far more pressing problems. This existence is called into question when Marc receives a broadcast from California claiming there to be no zombies, known as “revs” short for revenant, there. They decide to go to try and get to California. The trip is difficult, with challenges at almost every stop but they make it. Everything is fine and they get where they are going, a guarded and gated community in the Hollywood Hills. It is not until the arrival of a violent trio of marauders who are accepted into the community, that things go amiss. Fearing for their safety and the leader of the community proving an obstacle, they fight their way out. Just as they are wondering what to do next, the voice of the Southern California Emergency Broadcast, the pirate outreach station that had yet to lead the astray, comes on informing them of the perfect place.
